And Abraham said to the senior servant of his household who controlled his entire estate, "Place your hand under my thigh, and I will forswear you by G-d, the Lord of the heavens, and the Lord of the earth, that you shall not take a wife for my son from the daughters of the Canaanites among whom I live." (24:2-3)

The Be'er Mayim Chaim points out that Abraham was acting contrary to human nature. A Jew arriving in a town will look for a place where he can eat. A simple person will probably be satisfied by a sign hanging over a restaurant proclaiming it to be Kosher. Should he be on a slightly higher level, he will stop a religious-looking Jew in the street and ask him to recommend a reliable eatery. If the visitor is a pious Jew, he will go to shul and ask some of the more respected members of the community for their recommendations. And if he is a truly righteous individual, he will seek out the local rabbi and question him carefully about the reliability of the restaurants in town.

If this same traveler should come to the same town with a large sum of money to invest, he however, he would not dream of entrusting it to someone on the strength of a sign hanging over his establishment. Nor would he rely on the recommendations of other townsfolk, even the rabbi himself. Instead he would spend a considerable amount of time researching the situation in the town, and the reliability of the different people in business. And even after finally arriving at a decision about whom to entrust his hard-earned money with, he will insist on a written agreement, drawn up and duly witnessed.

Obviously, while people are inclined to be trusting in spiritual matters, they are far less inclined to take risks when their own financial interests are at stake.

Abraham, on the other hand, had his priorities arranged differently. In financial matters, Eliezer was "the senior servant who controlled his entire estate," completely trusted without reservation. But when he sent him out to find a wife for Isaac, a critical mission that would have many spiritual ramifications, Abraham was less inclined to take risks, and he insisted that Eliezer swear a solemn oath that he would act in Isaac's best interests.
